How does Northwestern determine the employment rate of its graduates?

Following the standard practice of most colleges and universities, Northwestern obtains information about the employment status of students at exit and follows up with graduates between six and nine months after graduation. Data from the follow-up survey is reported in April of each year for the previous complete academic year (December and May graduates).

How reliable is the information?

Graduates give a self-report on their employment status. Northwestern works diligently to get a response rate for the follow-up survey that meets or exceeds standards for statistical reliability.

What does Northwestern do to help graduates find fulfilling work?

Career & Leadership Development provides a range of free services for all students and alumni. All of our services are available in-person as well as online which include career coaching, online resources, webinars, class presentations, and professional development events. Career coaches provide training in job search strategies, interviewing, resume writing, and other professional development topics. Northwestern also utilizes Handshake, an online job-posting platform where students and alumni can search and apply for jobs. Other online career preparation platforms are used by Career & Leadership Development such as our LinkedIn Alumni & Student Groups, Candid Career, YouTube, Instagram, Big Interview, and direct student access to alumni professionals through Career Communities.
